

Article Structure

The submitted article must adhere to the following specific format:

Abstract (approximately 1500 characters)

The abstract should include:

- A description of the problem addressed in the article.
- An overview of the research context related to this issue.
- An exploration of the pedagogical context associated with the proposed solution.
- Keywords (up to 20).

Introduction (up to 5000 characters)

The introduction must clearly outline the problem that the article aims to address. This section should articulate the rationale behind the research activities, which will be detailed in the subsequent subsections. The problem may primarily relate to music theory instruction or closely associated topics.

Research Context (up to 5000 characters)

This section should explore the scientific and academic background relevant to the problem. Address the specific challenges the proposed theory or approach aims to resolve, and highlight the new perspectives it introduces to music theory. Additionally, discuss how it enhances the understanding of music within the framework of existing methodologies. If the article emphasizes the pedagogical implementation of a previously established scientific approach, it is important to address any challenges linked to its educational applicability (e.g., being too abstract, overly complex, or difficult to relate to music intuitively).

Pedagogical Context (up to 5000 characters)

In this section, describe the pedagogical framework that addresses the identified problem. Explain how the theoretical insights from the previous section will be communicated to students. Identify the elements of the theory that facilitate effective teaching and underscore the pedagogical strengths of the approach outlined in the article. Discuss how this methodology mitigates the issues presented in the introduction.

Practical Application (up to 5000 characters)

This section illustrates how the discussed approach operates in practice through a specific case study.

Summary (up to 1500 characters)

Conclude by summarising the problem addressed by the research and its resolution based on the scientific and pedagogical contexts explored.

Bibliography

Include a comprehensive bibliography that adheres to general submission guidelines.

Appendices

While it is generally advisable to incorporate illustrative materials directly within the article, if extensive examples disrupt the reading flow, these may be placed in appendices after the article.
